Miami gets even glitzi thanks to Tiffany & Co.'s new store in the Miami Design District

Under the eye of new design director Francesca Amfitheatr the brand has launched a successful T-themed collection of minimalist everyday jewelry that comes in sterling silver and gold (above). "This store is our first free standing, street-facing store in Miami," says Jonathan Bruckner, the brand's regional vice president. The new bi-level boutique carries the gamut alongside artwork by contemporary artist hand-picked by

SCHNABEL MEETS MIAMI

Amid the canyons of construction cranes that are transforming Brickell into a metropolis overnight lies the lot for Julian Schnabel's Southern sanctuary. The New York-based artist with a knack for interior design has been tapped for Buckell Platon, a 64-story residential tower that will be among the tallest buildings in Miami (700 feet!) upon completion in 2017. Its common areas will be decorated with custom treasures inspired by Schnabel—who designed the Palazzo Chupi residential building in Manhattan's West Village—such as shark's-tooth-shaped bronze light fixtures, an oversized biomorphic mantle and a vintage sofa upholstered in peacock fabric and fringe. "Every white marble lobby here started to look the same to me," says the project's Ugo Colombo, founder of CIVIC Group, a Miami development firm known for quality design long before architects infiltrated the landscape. "His style has a Spanish flair, too, that speaks to Latin Americans." But will Miami Beach-favoring New Yorkers come? Colombo is pulling out all the stops, starting with a rooftop pool with 360-degree views. A glass exterior, solid wood doors and Snaiidero kitchens with Miele appliances also compete with their contemporary counterparts across the bay. "I think what will appeal to urbanites most, though, is being able to walk outside and have so much within a single block," he says.
